MISHA AND THE VINTAGE TYPEWRITER

Misha bought a magic typewriter. At first glance, it didn't seem magical at all, but the merchant said that it was a very unique and special machine, and since he was too old for such adventures, he had to sell it. Misha didn't really understand what kind of adventures a typewriter could provide, but he didn't ask, he was just excited to see how it works. At home, however, it turned out that the typewriter was not only not magical, but it didn't even work properly: it didn't print the letters that Misha typed in with one finger. Disappointed, he placed the last snow-white sheet into the machine and walked to the window. He turned back when the typewriter made a noise, and started to work of its own accord. He was shocked to see a clearly legible, flawless sentence on the paper: Are you ready for a new adventure? Misha was always ready for all kinds of adventures, but he wasn't prepared for witchcraft at all. Terrified, he ran out of the room, and only dared to return a couple of days later. The sentence was still there, waiting for him, exactly the same as it was: curt and curious. Misha looked at it. He was wondering how crazy it would be to answer. "It's not embarrassing if nobody sees it," he thought, and typed the answer: Yes! A cheerful murmur escaped the machine, and the keys started to move. Black letters flowed onto the paper with cheerful little bumps. They always spelled out directions, or, mostly, just a short sentence: If you step out of the house, head right - and Misha followed the instructions curiously. He never knew where he would go or how long the journey would take, but wonderful things happened to him every time. He still doesn't understand how the machine knows the things it tells him, but he can hardly wait for each morning to come, for the moment when he sees the question: Are you ready for a new adventure? ...and Misha's answer is always the same.
